ABOUT ASSISTED LIVING

A majority of our population think “assisted living” is a politically correct term for “nursing home” and this is far from true. Nursing homes, or skilled nursing facilities, are designed for people with many health requirements who are unable to care for themselves. Whereas, assisted living communities are designed for individuals who want to maintain a level of independence but may need assistance with a few of their daily living activities, such as bathing, getting dressed, preparing meals, and medication assistance.

At Springfield Assisted Living we provide our residents with state-of-the-art care in an environment that promotes and enhances their independence. We care for each resident individually, so they receive the appropriate assistance for their level of need. We work with each of our residents, understanding their needs first and then crafting together a plan that fits their situation. We also monitor our residents’ needs during their stay and can easily adjust plans at any time. Our residents enjoy life with the confidence of knowing we are here for them in whatever way they need, 24 hours a day, seven days a week.
